

Bio: Katie Kansy

Katie was born and raised in a Christian family in a small town in Ohio. A passion for people and a strong sense of leadership, lead her to a B.S. in Human Resources and Management from Wright State University. She's led thousands of individuals on various teams over the course of her ten-year retail career and now spends her days working from home, recruiting for a large skincare and cosmetics company and writing for her blog.

As a single mom to a sweet redhead girl, often traveling for work, Katie wasn't sure she would have more kids or even get remarried, but God graced her with a gentle, incredibly artistic husband who always says yes to her wild ideas. Together, they've adopted a son and welcomed a ten-pound baby boy, all within the last year.

Despite running from God in her late teens and early career, she sees his mercy every day. While sitting in church one morning, she felt a stir in her heart and a clear message from the Lord, and chose to shelter a young, single mom and her son; the one they've now adopted. This experience has led her to create awareness around kinship families and adoption education, as well as helping women seek the resources they need to be successful. Saying yes to God when there were no answers to her questions has led to the most life changing experience she never imagined she needed.
